Skills for an Automated Future

The OECD estimates that, due to technological change, 9% of jobs in Canada are at risk of elimination, and 32% of Canadians are at risk of having their employment substantially altered. The aim of this project is to examine the impact changing technologies, automation and artificial intelligence will have on the labour needs of business and highlight the policies that will position the Canadian economy to benefit, both for employees and businesses alike.

Canada's skill training programs are designed around assumptions of low turnover, long-term careers and a direct progression from primary and secondary education to post-secondary job training to employment. This model is at risk of no longer functioning as the pace of technological change increases, jobs are altered or eliminated, and more business sectors are disrupted. Programs, like the Canada Job Grant, have been designed to encourage employer spending on training, but are they effective?

The project will examine the impacts and necessary policy responses in the areas of immigration, skills training and labour market information that would enable Canadian businesses to access the skilled workers they require to grow and remain competitive.

Looking Forward

The Canadian Chamber of Commerce is the national leader in public policy advocacy on national and international business issues and is focused on fostering a strong, competitive economic environment that benefits businesses, communities and families across Canada.
